Stuart Address has a quarter-century of experience in civil and business law, and particularly enjoys handling civil rights and discrimination issues.

in Washington, D.C., where he graduated with honors in 1985.

He has practiced law in small, medium and large law firms, including those which contain more than 100 attorneys.

Six years ago, he decided to open his own legal practice designed to provide more personalized attention to his clients. He now works out of Northgate Plaza in downtown Stuart.

He consistently pursues rightful outcomes for his clients with aggressive advocacy.

"I get emotionally involved in cases," he said. "When I need to step back and give advice, I do, but when it comes to a motion, a hearing or a trial, I have to feel like I'm going into battle. And I can't do that if I don't care."

"If I don't care, then it's not the right client or case for me."

Address particularly enjoys taking cases dealing with civil rights or discrimination.

One of his clients, Michael, was fired after he received a juror summons. He posted his experience working with Address on AVVO.com, a site that rates doctors and lawyers, and allows consumers to ask questions for free.

"I contacted Mr. Address for being terminated after receiving a juror summons. He was very helpful and straight forward."

Another client, Mike P., involved in a Family & Medical Leave Act case, wrote, "Once I received the phone call from Mr. Address that he was going to defend me, I knew I had a fighter. Mr. Address treated me and my family with the utmost of respect. He guided me through the process ... (and) provided compassionate emotional support right into trial, during the trial, and beyond with post-trial motions. Mr. Address provided beyond what I expected of an attorney."
